Ter. 4. quis (used adjectively for what, chiefly with substantives which denote a person: cf. Madvig Lat. Gr. 88, 1): what senator? quis senator? Cic.: in such cases the inquiry seems after the name only, and not, as with "qui," after the character. 5. qui, quae, quod (an inquiry after character, kind, etc. is usually implied): what Chaerea? qui Chaerea? Ter.: what sweeter song can be found? what more pleasant actor? qui cantus dulcior inveniri potest? qui actor jucundior? Cic.: what power have I? quae in me est facultas? Ter. III. Relative: equivalent to that which: 1. quod: why do you wish for what you possess? cur optas quod habes? Att. 8, 12, A. 2. quisquis: the neuter quicquid is chiefly substantive, constr. like quodcunque; but in other genders and cases it is used adjectively: whatever man, quisquis homo, Pl.: with whatever design he did it, quoquo consilio fecit, Cic. ("Quicunque" and "quisquis" are both used when among a number of specimens in a class none is excepted; but "quisquis" appears more summarily to dismiss the specimens as equal among themselves: e. g.: quodcunque est, tibi habe, take all that there is: quicquid est tibi habe, take anything or everything that there is, it is all the same. Perhaps too "quicquid" leaves it more uncertain whether there is much or little).

when: 1. quum: the most gen. word for the varying shades of meaning of when: it denotes the coincidence of two facts, or the sequence of one after the other. When used purely of time with no idea of cause and effect, quum is constr. with indic. of any tense (v. Lat. Gr. § 485): so too with indic. of repeated actions, when it means as often as. Where cause and effect are implied, constr. with subj.: hence in historical sequence it usually takes subj. (v. Lat. Gr. §§ 483, 484), some relation of cause and effect being almost necessarily implied: with subj., if for when we might substitute since, whereas, etc.: or if it is used by periphr. to supply the lack of a past part. active in Latin. 2. ŭbi: denotes a point of time from which some other takes its beginning: w. (as soon as) the Helvetii were informed they sent ambassadors, ubi Helvetii certiores facti sunt, legatos mittunt, Caes. B. G. 1, 7: it is constr. with indic. usually; the subj., where it occurs, being hardly attributable to "ubi:" e. g., w. once a man has perjured himself he must not henceforth be believed, ubi semel quis pejeraverit, ei credi postea non oportet Cic. Rab. Post 13, 36: where the subj. is used because it is a supposed case. 3. ŭt: as soon as ever: to mark an occurrence immediately preceding the main action: *w.
